As part of their plan to further marginalize the Occupy Movement following the 2012 presidential election, federal agencies, media outlets and politicians from both political parties used the Occupy Movement as a tool to push policies intended to legitimize the war on protest. In the first two years of Obama's presidency, police, federal agents, officials and the corporate interests behind the National Guard and State Department were working with the media and political establishment at every turn, creating the appearance of a growing, violent and dangerous movement and then actively pursuing law enforcement efforts to destroy such movements. As a result, the Occupy Movement is a far lesser part of American society than had even been thought in the early days of the movement.

The two most recent examples of law enforcement violence against nonviolent protesters are Ferguson, Mo., and Baltimore. In 2011, as protests over the killing of unarmed black teenager Trayvon Martin spread, police responded with deadly force against several hundred of their black neighbors. In a stunning display of blatant violence against activists, dozens of police officers were injured or killed, including two officers killed by citizens with batons.. That month's violent demonstrations were the culmination of a two year-long push by the U.S. government for war against Occupy Wall Street. In an attempt to make the Occupy movement more palatable to the establishment, the Obama administration began an aggressive and coordinated campaign to make radical left-wing protest movements more palatable to the American political establishment and the American police state, which sought to repress the anti-war protests by focusing on the domestic unrest and political activities of left-wing groups. By focusing their anger on the Occupy Movement, the U.S. government was trying to portray Occupy Wall Street protestors and civil rights activists as violent and violent protestors who would disrupt American business and government. 44ad931eb4 Malena 2000 Uncut 720p English Subtitles
